Congress appropriated funds in 1831 for erection of a light house in the area of Chincoteague Island. The present site was then chosen, and a structure was completed and lighted by January, 1833. The tower was soon found to be too low and the light too weak to effectively warn ships of the dangerous shoals. As a result, Congress appropriated money for the replacement of the lighthouse in 1859. Construction began the following year, but work ceased with the coming of the War Between the States. Work was resumed after the war, the interior stair and light mechanism being imported from France, and the new structure was lighted on October 1, 1867.

The lighthouse continues to be maintained as a nautical aid, and the original lamp has been replaced by an automatic lantern. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration uses the lighthouse and associated buildings in conjunction with their aeronautical activities on nearby Wallops Island.

Assateague Lighthouse is a handsome example of midnineteenth century lighthouse construction, and it is the only one of that period surviving in Virginia.
