and a catalon the administration of the second day

Fairfield house is presently a five-part complex with a two-and-a-half story hipped roof central block having walls of irregular native limestone ashlar throughout. Twentieth-century additions to the complex include the dormers on the central block, the one-story attached dependencies at the farthest ends of the complex, the additions to the rears of the original one-story wings, and the broad screened-in one-story porch on the garden front; the small one-story portico on the entrance front is a nineteenth-century addition.

The plan of the central block is a striking parallel to that of Kenmore, having the drawing room extended across three of the five bays on the garden front, with two nearly square rooms in the other corners. The stairhall is arranged almost precisely as that of Kenmore, the stairway ascending in the same manner, and having a similar balustrade detail. Fairfield lacks the rich plaster-work decoration of Kenmore, but the surviving woodwork and panelling in the principal rooms is of fine quality. The drawing room chimney-piece features a panelled overmantel flanked by Doric pilasters on pedestals.

Fairfield retains a number of old outbuildings, none of which can be positively dated from the eighteenth century. The most interesting is the large brick, frame and stone barn to the south of the house. A much enlarged and altered early overseer's house stands to the east of the main house. Fairfield's extensive gardens are ornamented with an abundance of fine English boxwood, some of which is believed to have survived from the eighteenth century....The pastoral setting of the entire complex is quite beautiful and unspoiled.
