British warships sunk off Yorktown in the siege of 1781 include the 44 gun fifth rater Charon, 28 gun frigate Guadaloupe, 24 gun frigate Fowey, and an undetermined number of smaller ships and boats. Two contemporary maps - the 1781 Rochambeau French map of Yorktown and the 1782 Bauman American map - show the wrecked fleet, with about fifteen vessels off Gloucester Point and twenty-five or more off the Yorktown shore.

Interest in salvaging the wrecks dates from soon after the battle, when French forces attempted to raise the Guadaloupe and perhaps several other ships, although the success of the French effort is not known. In 1852 Thomas Ashe of Gloucester County petitioned the General Assembly to allow him to salvage brass cannon from an "English frigate of large class", but his success is also unknown. Several wrecks were dug into by the National Park Service and the Mariner's Museum in 1934-35. Numerous small artifacts as well as anchors, cannon, and ship's timbers were recovered at that time. In 1954 Chief Warrant Officer Eugene F. Moran, head of diver training at Fort Eustis, found eleven wooden wrecks near Gloucester Point. wrecks, said to range from 40 to 100 feet in length, were believed to be part of the British fleet. Moran noted that the ship's timbers were well preserved in the mud. No further investigation was made by the Parks service or Mariner's Museum. Amateur divers have since recovered a variety of ceramics, glass, and metal objects from the wrecks.

No thorough study of the wrecks has been undertaken, but extensive ship structures and quantities of equipment and supplies must lie undisturbed on the bed of the York River. An example of the quality of preservation possible is the head of a salt pork barrel found in the 1934-35 project. Its inscription, "Shaw June 22 '80 S.P.", was still legible.

The 1781 British wrecks in the York River are significant underwater remains because of their important historical associations and their archaeological potential. The wrecks have great "time capsule" value because of their probable good state of preservation and known date of demise. Careful excavation of the wrecks could provide much information about the British ships and their accourrements. An extensive array of artifacts was recovered in the limited exploration of 1934-35, but that work was not carried out with the controlled scientific methods now employed in underwater archaeology.

Cornwallis' fleet, largely destroyed in the 1781 action, might have been a key force in saving the British from defeat at Yorktown and prolonging the Revolutionary War. The fleet had transported Cornwallis' troops from Portsmouth to Yorktown in early August to await the arrival of British naval forces under the command of Lord Hood. However, Hood's fleet was driven from the Chesapeake Bay by Admiral de Grasse in the Battle of the Virginia Capes on September 5th. The French fleet, reinforced by Admiral de Barras, controlled the entrance to the Chesapeake and established a blockade of the York River. Washington and Lafayette firmly sealed off any land escape from Yorktown in September, and Cornwallis prepared to withstand a siege, having cannon and supplies removed from the ships to enlarge his land batteries.

The French fleet prevented the British ships from effectively aiding Cornwallis, and on the night of September 21st, the fireship Vulcan was unsuccessful in attempting to set fire to the French fleet. St. George Tucker, a careful observer of the Yorktown Battle, recorded in his journal on September 30th that Cornwallis might transfer his forces by ship up the York to West Point. There were no allied ships up river, but the British did not attempt the move. The American land batteries began bombardment on October 6th, and some of the British ships shifted their anchorage to Gloucester Point across the river. The next day a French battery set fire to the largest British ship, the Charon, and three transports. Cornwallis had a number of the vessels sunk to prevent attack from the French fleet down river. The two largest remaining ships, Guadaloupe and Fowey, were scuttled too to prevent capture. On the night of October 16th, Cornwallis attempted to transfer his troops across the river in small boats, but the evacuation was prevented by a violent squall. A British flag of truce was shown the next morning, and on October 19th the articles of capitulation were signed. Remaining British vessels became the property of the French Navy, but the majority of the fleet has been sunk in the York River.
