Rockledge is located near Virginia Route 123 on the northern edge of Occoquan and overlooks the town and Occoquan Creek. The House sits on a crag, virtually carved out of a solid rock face which rises abruptly behind the house and descends immediately in front of the facade to the road below. The structure stands in a state of neglect with two of its three outbuildings remaining.

The stately dwelling is well-proportioned and has some fine architectural detailing. The main section is one room deep and two-and-one-half-stories in height. This section is constructed with stones from the nearby quarry on Occordian Creek. Stone houses are rare in Tidewater Virginia and two of Rockledge's three sections are of this material. Of the two south wings, the smaller wing, containing the bread oven kitchen, probably was constructed The stone wing connecting the original section to the kitchen came The six-bay facade, the original nouse section and the connecting later. wing, faces east and has a stone water-table. The entrance door is in the fourth bay from the south end of the house, and is reached by steps leading to an elevated stone landing at the same level as the first floor. Three interior brick chimney stacks are in the main structure located at each of the gable ends and between the second and third bays. The three dormer windows with pedimented gables are placed, one each, at the center of the roof span and at each quarter-span point. These dormers appear to have been added after the construction of the stone addition between the kitchen and the main house. The roof is covered with asphalt shingles laid over the early wood shingles. A modillin cornice with a wall of Troy free molding runs the entire length of the facade. The first and second story fenestration pattern is similarly treated. Louvered shutters frame the second story sixover-nine sash while paneled shutters flank the six-over-six sash first story windows. Vertically barred grills are found in the water-table under the second and third bays and between the fifth and sixth bays from the south end; A later window is found in the water-table between the first and second bays. The stonework throughout the entire structure is laid in a rough pattern.

The facade of the one-and-one-half story brick kitchen wing, immediately to the south of the main residence, has been altered over the years. A tall interior brick chimney stack is found in the exposed gable end and two pedimente gabled dormer windows are used on the asphalt shingled roof. A simple box cornice is found under the eaves of the facade. The three-bay facade consists of a doorway centered between two small windows, one double window with three-over-three sash and a single window with three-over-three sash.

The west elevation, which is the rear of the house, is partially built into the cliff. The fenestration patterns are irregular and much of the sash is missing. A simple cornice runs almost the entire length of the west elevation. The roof contains one pedimented gabled dormer placed roughly in the center of the roof span. The first floor is entered through a portal on axis with the front door on the east elevation and is connected to it by a center hall. Projecting from the wall plane of the west elevation, the kitchen wing envelopes the south corner of the main structure. One pedimented gable dormer window is found in the roof as well as a gable dormered doorway. No fenestration pattern can be detected on the first floor.

The south elevation forms an interesting composition of superimposed gable ends of various roof pitches, construction materials and fenestration patterns. Both the north and south elevations have two small windows of two-over-two-sash placed on either side of the chimney stack in the gable ends.

These windows were probably the original primary sources of light for the third floor attic space.

Three large rooms in addition to the central hall and stairway form the first floor of the main house. Simple woodwork is found in these rooms: pedestal type chair rails, base boards and cornices. The kitchen wing consists of a large workspace area dominated by a sizeable fireplace with an iron lintel and two small bake ovens, where the local flour was baked into loaves for commercial use. A pantry is also located in the kitchen wing. The second floor of the house consists of three rooms, two with fireplaces, plus a stair-hall and a connecting passageway which leads to the attic space of the kitchen wing which also has a fireplace. The third floor consists of three rooms, a stair-hall and closet.

The condition of Rockledge can only be described as poor due to neglect over many years. Much of the house has been vandalized and structural problems have developed. All of the mantels and much of the other interior woodwork has been removed.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Rockledge is significant for its association with the town of Occoquan and the successive entrepreneurs who sought to realize the town's potential as a milling, manufacturing, shipping, and travel center. The finely proportioned and detailed Georgian house is also claimed to be an early work by William Buckland, foremost architect of the late-colonial Chesapeake region. Buckland allegedly supervised construction of the house under contract to the quixotic industrialist John Ballendine, the latter then being engaged in the milling and foundry industries "at or near the falls of Occoquan."

Ballendine was soon displaced from his home and businesses by an erstwhile partner, John Semple. The imaginative, but imprudent and poorly capitalized Ballendine, attempted at one time or another to dig canals, or otherwise improve transportation on the Potomac or James Rivers; develop common carrier transportation on the Potomac; transport troops or build their cannon; and conduct sawmills. The picturesque site of Rockledge, hacked out of solid rock and overlooking the falls of Occoquan, is a testimonial to Ballendine's imagination.

Ballendine's successor gave up the forge and expanded his milling operations to cope with the increasing production of wheat, which had become the staple agricultural crop of Northern Virginia. Semple's holdings eventually passed to Nathaniel Ellicott, a member of one of Jeffersonian America's foremost Quaker and milling families, the founders of Ellicott City, Maryland. Ellicott employed an itinerant teacher and writer whose account of Occoquan included a reference to Rockledge, "a house built on a rock," which surely would have delighted the otherwise dour Ellicott.

The estuary of the Occoquan has attracted the attention of travellers since the time of John Smith. Its natural advantages, being practical as well as picturesque, were recognized by the 1650s when the land was patented, among the first to be taken up in Northern Virginia. Andrew Burnaby (1760), John Davis (1801), and Joseph Martin (1836) each recorded their impressions of the Occoquan as it nears the Chesapeake.

The Occoquan combined continuously strong water power at its falls with an estuary so broad and deep that it could accommodate the largest ships of its day. The town which developed was a concentration point for tabacco during the first-half of the 18th century, and a link in the great Southern mail route for a century thereafter. The tavern at Occoquan was described as superior to most.

By the mid-1830s there were numerous houses, shops, stores, and manufacturies, and every prospect of continued growth and prosperity.

But the estuary of the Occoquan silted up, and the back country trade and

Occoquan declined, but the river rolled on "along mountains that rise abruptly
