DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

[REDACTED] Site, including both prehistoric and historic components, [REDACTED]
[REDACTED]
known in the Colonial period as [REDACTED]

The prehistoric potential of the site was first noted in 1892 when aboriginal burials were uncovered, but not removed, while workmen were excavating for the construction of an ice house.

Archaeological investigations by the Archaeological Society of Virginia, Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission, and the Virginia State Library began in October 1968. In September 1969 the investigation was resumed by the Virginia State Library and the Archaeological Society of Virginia, who sampled the aboriginal occupation and located an historic component. Excavations uncovered aboriginal features, [REDACTED]

[REDACTED]
These features, containing predominantly Dan River ceramics (95.7%), with some Radford (3.3%), and New River ceramics (1%), date from the Late Woodland period. The Dan River component is within the northern-most limits of its reported range in Virginia. The low acidity in the soil accounted for the unusually well preserved faunal and charred vegetal remains, and bone and shell artifacts. Six Archaic period projectile points, including Kirk and Otter Creek, suggest that the site was sporadically visited from 6000 to 2000 B.C. Historical features uncovered included a Colonial ditch, an unmortared stone foundation with a later brick addition, presumed to be the house of [REDACTED] and the remains of an ice house built in 1892.
