Summary Description: Monroe Hill is a complex of buildings that include the main house, the James Monroe law office, and two arcaded ranges constructed as student rooms. The complex is situated on McCormick Road and overlooks the University of Virginia grounds. The one-and-one-half-story James Monroe Law Office was the first structure on the site and was built ca. 1790. The main house, built ca. 1814, is a two-story brick and stucco double-pile dwelling with a standing seam hipped roof. The earliest part of the house was built around the same time as the law office but was later enlarged and adorned with Greek Revival details. Attached to the house is an arcade of six student rooms known as Dawson's Row. Another arcade of six student rooms (Brown Range) is situated perpendicular to the first range and begins at a corner of the law office. All structures are of brick and have standing seam metal roofs.

Detailed Description: James Monroe began construction of a small farmhouse and law office on the property around 1790. The brick dwelling was described as being one story high, 26 by 20 feet with the law office having an identical footprint. There was also a one-story frame kitchen, no longer extant, 20 by 28 feet with walls filled with brick nogging. The main house at Monroe Hill has been greatly enlarged from the original foot plan. In 1814, John Perry, one of Thomas Jefferson's builders, acquired the property and built the double-pile house with five-bay façade. The Greek Revival façade, which faces southeast, is not symmetrical, however, and the windows on the western half are not as widely spaced as those on the original eastern portion revealing the two periods of construction. The front and rear facades are brick covered with stucco and the side walls are 7-course common brick bond. All walls are painted white. The double-hung windows on the front façade have 9-over-9-light windows and louvered shutters. There are exterior brick chimneys on either side of the house. A plain entablature runs beneath the eaves of a low-pitched hipped roof. A one-story portico with paired Tuscan columns shelters the main entrance. The front door has a transom and sidelights. The door and sidelights are framed by Doric pilasters. The north façade also is five bays wide with 6- over-6-light windows on the first floor. There is a wooden veranda with chamfered posts set on brick piers above a high cellar. The interior arrangement features a slightly off-center central passage with corresponding exterior doors on the north and south sides. The stair rises from the back of the passage and there are four rooms on each floor. A wide, open stair hall bisects the second floor. The southeast basement room is part of the original section. It has four foot high stone foundations topped with three feet of brick laid in two-course common bond. At the eastern end of the room is a large fireplace with slate hearth.

Above this room is a room known as the Dining Room, which would have been the main part of the Monroe-era house. The south windows have two 9-over-9-light windows that are similar to those in the Law Office. Dawson's Row, the arcaded row of six student rooms that runs between the main house and the law Office, is whitewashed 5-course American bond brick with standing seam metal roof. A second row of six arcaded student rooms, Brown Range, was constructed perpendicular to the other buildings, but with the same characteristics as Dawson's Row. The arcades were built in 1848. To the right of the main house is a brick one-car garage in 5-course common bond whitewashed to match the other buildings. The law office measures 26 by 20 feet and is two bays wide and one and one-half stories high. It is the oldest part of the complex. The foundation is of fieldstone. The whitewashed brick structure is of Flemish bond with beaded weatherboards in the gable end. There are two brick exterior end chimneys. The interior of the office has wooden framing. Finished ceiling beams below the main floor in the present-day crawl space indicate that it may have originally had a basement. There are three windows in the crawl space and a larger opening on the north side was probably a bulkhead entrance. All openings have been closed in using brick laid in five-course American bond. There is an entrance on the back (northwest) wall and one from the arcade. The present interior of the small building extends into one of the adjacent student rooms. The Law office now consists of two small rooms on the first floor with a steep stair in a narrow hall leading to the second floor. Some of the interior woodwork has been replaced including window moldings in the north rooms. All door moldings except the ones connecting the south rooms have been replaced. The fireplace in the northeast room has been sealed. Upstairs a closet and bathroom have been added and the stair has been altered from its original condition.

Summary Statement of Significance: Monroe Hill originated as a small dwelling and law office built for James Monroe in 1790. Monroe occupied the property only briefly and sold the land to John Perry in 1814. Perry, one of the builders of the University of Virginia, enlarged the main house and eventually sold the property to the University. The main dwelling served as home of the proctor of the University for a time, but eventually came to be used for student use. Two arcaded ranges, each with six student rooms, were built in 1848 and the site became a residential college for students given grants by the Commonwealth of Virginia to attend the University. Monroe Hill continues to be used for educational purposes as a residential college, now known as Brown College.

Historical Background: The land upon which Monroe Hill now stands was originally part of the land holdings of George Nicholas of Williamsburg who was an elder brother of former Virginia state governor, Wilson Cary Nicholas. By 1784, Nicholas was practicing law in Charlottesville and in 1786 he was the Albemarle County representative to the Virginia General Assembly. He moved to Kentucky in 1790 and sold 800 acres of his property to James Monroe. James Monroe called the property Lower Plantation and in 1790 he constructed three buildings on the property; a brick dwelling, a brick law office, and a frame kitchen. That same year he was elected as a senator from Virginia to the Second Continental Congress and consequently spent little time on the property in Albemarle County. Monroe subsequently purchased acreage near Monticello and began construction of a larger, permanent home there. From 1794 to 1797, Monroe's brother, Joseph Monroe, occupied the Lower Plantation property. The property changed hands several times in the next few years until John Perry, one of the builders working under Thomas Jefferson, purchased it in 1814. During his ownership, the house was substantially enlarged. In 1817, Perry sold the property to be held in trust as the future site of the University of Virginia, with the provision that he be hired as a builder for the University. The Monroe Hill house served as the home of the University proctor in the second quarter of the nineteenth century and Proctor Arthur P. Brockenbrough resided there. The house was eventually appropriated as housing for students attending the University on state scholarships and in 1848 two arcaded ranges, each containing six student rooms, were constructed. Dawson's Row was built in the space between the main house and the Law Office and Brown Range was built on the other side of the Law Office perpendicular to the other buildings. After the Civil War, George Sidney Ford remodeled the main house. In 1986, the complex became the site of a residential college, originally called Monroe Hill College and renamed Brown College in 1994. The main house became the principal's house for the residential college. An elevator was installed on the northwest side of the sloping site to make it handicapped accessible in 1994.
