DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Herndon Depot is a simple, one-story wooden vertical board and batten structure. The building is rectangular in shape, and measures 70'6" x 20'1". It is basically in its original condition, however, approximately 20 feet of the west end of the building have been removed to allow construction of a road. The original west end wall was then replaced on the building. Victorian style buttresses under the eaves are the building's only decorative feature. The window and door framings are original, as are the semaphore and several pieces of exterior hardware. The roofing material is the original sculptured metal, recently coated with fireproof roofing tar. The two baggage doors are original and although currently blocked from within, they can be put into working condition. The thresholds of both baggage and passenger doors show obvious signs of wear. The exterior is covered with board on board siding, eight inches on center with the bottom board being eight inches wide and the top board three inches wide. The existing color scheme is appropriate but not original.

The interior of the station is presently used for the offices of the Herndon Department of Public Works. Care has been taken, however, to maintain the room arrangements of the old railroad station. There are two waiting rooms, each 14'll" x 18'9", divided by a ticket master's room, 8'l" x 21'9". The ticket master's room divided the waiting room for "whites" from the waiting room for "coloreds." All of this area has the original flooring, ceiling and walls. Some window panes and most door and window hardware are original.

The baggage area measures 29'll" x 18'9" with a raised floor of the original one-foot wide planking. The interior walls and ceiling in this area have been modernized.

The Herndon Depot is now part of the Herndon Town Square Complex, consisting of the station and the town hall. It is attractively sited with landscaping, brick plazas, seeding areas and a fountain in the center of the downtown area of Herndon. The work on the building has been done very carefully, and it remains a simple and attractive 19th-century structure.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Herndon Depot was the center of a large and profitable dairying area. In 1907 it was reported that "no point on either the main line or Bluemont branch of the Southern Railway ships more milk than Herndon."

Located 21 miles from Washington, DC, the Herndon Depot became both a focus for shipment of dairy products and for some of the first commuters to Washington.

The Herndon Depot was constructed in 1857 as a stop on the Alexandria, Loudoun and Hampshire railroad. The greatly increased efficiency of railroad transportation enabled area farmers to ship their goods to market more quickly and to plow the resulting profits back into their land. The routing of the railway line through this rural area resulted in the establishment of a thriving small community.

An enthusiastic correspondent in the November 21, 1859 issue of the Alexandria Gazette wrote that no one "had any doubt that the future will witness at this beautiful spot a busy, active population, who may enjoy all the luxuries of the city without any of the annoyance of brick walls, dusty streets, and the noise and bustle of dairy business."

In 1858 the town received a post office named for Captain William Lewis Herndon, a Virginia-born sea captain who had heroically gone down with his ship after directing passengers and crew into lifeboats. A survivor of the disaster is said to have told the story at a meeting held to choose a name, and so impressed the local citizens that they adopted the name of Herndon for the post office and the local community.

The town was legally incorporated in 1879, keeping the name of Herndon, and the first town council meetings were held at the depot. Although the official population was low, area farmers made Herndon their market center, with notable success. In 1907, the Industrial and Historical Sketch of Fairfax County noted that "no point on either the main line or Bluemont branch of the Southern Railway ships more milk than Herndon."

The personal remembrances of Lottie Dyer Schneider, born the year Herndon was incorporated, provide a unique view of Herndon in the later 19th century. She recalls "The main industry in the early days was shipping milk to Washington. Hundreds of gallons of milk were shipped daily on express cars, and I seem to hear even today, the noisy banging of cans which resounded far and wide both morning and evening when they were loaded and unloaded at the big platform erected across the road from the depot.

"In the evening some of our colored citizens would frequently assemble on this platform and to the accompaniment of their banjoes sing songs and while away the twilight hours."2

In 1912 the steam powered railroad was converted to the electric Washington and Old Dominion Railway line, bringing an increased number of Washington commuters to live in Herndon. In 1928, the County Chamber of Commerce reported "Herndon (after Falls Church) is the second largest town in the County. Many of Herndon's residents commute daily to Washington, 25 (sic) miles distant."

Increasingly, improved roads drew the passengers from the trolley lines to the automobile, and in its later years the station was used more as a freight depot than as a passenger terminal. Service was discontinued during the 1960s and the station was owned by the Virginia Electric Power Company, and leased to the town of Herndon until 1979.

In 1970 the Herndon Historical Society was organized and, in conjunction with the town, began the restoration of the depot. Memorabilia of Captain Herndon were collected and housed in the depot. In 1974 restoration was completed and the building is being utilized as the office for the town's Public Works Department. The brick town square around the depot was refurbished and is now the setting for summer concerts. The station has become the emblem of the town, and photos and sketches of it are prominent on the cover of town publications.

Herndon depot is an excellent example of the simple railroad station whose presence was at the same time the focal point and the point of departure for the small rural communities of the 19th and 20th centuries.
